White House says Trump did not discuss intel with Russians

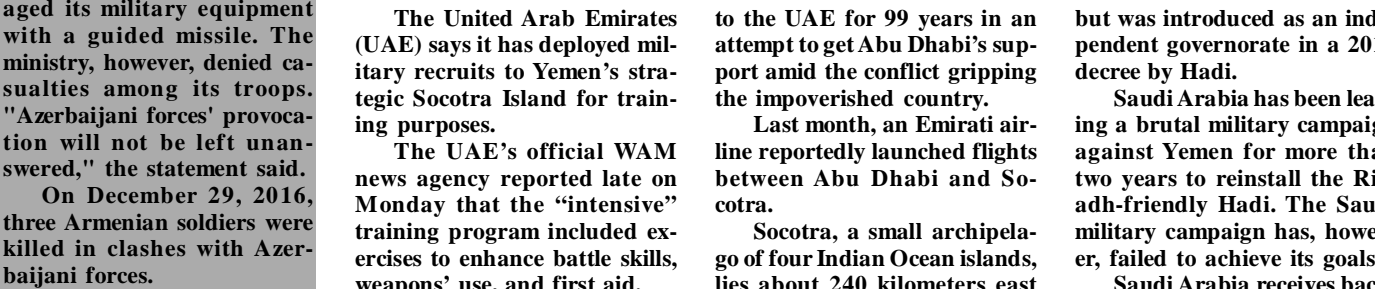

US President Donald Trump discussed specific intel threats with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and Moscow's envoy to the US in the Oval Office last week, but not "concrete or methodical" intelligence sources or methods, the White House said on Tuesday. The statement from White House National Security Advisor IH McMaster and Secretary of State Rex Tillerson came after The Washington Post reported that Trump had revealed classified information to the Russians about a threat posed by ISIS groups. "The president's foreign minister reviewed common threats from terrorist organizations to include threats to the United States and its allies," said McMaster, who also said that Trump had not discussed intelligence sources or methods with Lavrov.
