

Kazakhstan seeks Russia-led security group's help

MOSCOW — In the face of mounting domestic unrest and apparent uncertainty over the loyalty of law enforcement and military forces, Kazakhstan's president has turned to a Russia-dominated security alliance for help.

Within hours, the Collective Security Treaty Organization, or CSTO, announced its readiness to accept the plan for assistance. By Thursday, thousands of Russian troops were on their way to Kazakhstan. Kazakhstan Deputy Foreign Minister Bekzat Nulybayev said 2,500 CSTO peacekeepers would be deployed.

This marks the first time the CSTO has been engaged in a major peacekeeping operation.

WHAT IS THE CSTO? The Collective Security Treaty Organization was formed in the late 1990s following the collapse of the Soviet Union. Besides Russia, it includes Armenia, Belarus, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan.

Despite its name, the pact has at times struggled to define its purpose. Failure to engage in operations shortly after the 2009 election in Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan, were engaged in a
